

WAVES AT HUNTER MARK ANNIVERSARY

Review Held at End of First
Year—One Gets Medals in Behalf of Hero Husband

Two regiments of Waves in basic training at "U. S. S. Hunter" in the Bronx marched in review yesterday on the first anniversary of the opening of the school for Navy women. Rear Admiral E. J. Marquart, commandant of the Third Naval District, took the review in the Eighth Regiment Armory at Kingsbridge Road and Jerome Avenue, where the Waves were led by their own drum and bugle corps.

Others in the reviewing stand included Rear Admiral Randall Jacobs, chief of Navy personnel; Grover Whalen and other members of the Navy's Civilian Advisory Committee; Dean Virginia Gildersleeve of Barnard College, chairman of the Waves educational advisory council, and two graduates of the school. These were Yeoman Second Class Mary Fedorowich of Detroit, the first Wave to enter the school and now stationed at San Diego, Calif., and Seaman Second Class Beatrice D. Hurles, now learning parachute rigging at Lakehurst, N. J.

With 3,500 Waves standing at attention, Seaman Hurles received from Capt. William F. Amsden, commanding officer of the school, the air medal with two oak leaf clusters in behalf of her husband, Sgt. Paul D. Hurles, who lost his life in the raid on Munster, Germany, last October.

A gunner in the plane piloted by Lieut. John G. Winant Jr., son of the Ambassador, Sergeant Hurles was one of six who baled out, and who were reportedly machine-gunned by a Focke-Wulf.

After the review the admirals, their staffs and civilian guests had luncheon at the officers' mess and praised the accomplishments of the school.

The school, which has graduated 36,550 Waves in the last year, besides 5,000 women marines and Spars before separate schools were opened for them, expects to have trained a total of 100,000 by the end of this year, according to Admiral Jacobs.
